Aims

1. Develop a deep understanding of sociological perspectives on identity and representation, and equality and diversity, in contemporary society, and to explore the intersections of race, class, gender, sexuality, age, disability and/or social class.

2. Develop, enhance and practise essential academic study skills, including library search, identifying and analysing relevant sources, referencing, and academic writing.

3. Reflect upon students' personal development (PDP).

Learning Outcomes

After completing the module the student should be able to:

- 1 Explain and analyse the ways in which identity and inequality can become the basis for social divisions and political mobilisation, and apply a variety of sociological theories and/or definitions of identity, equality and intersectionality to contemporary society.
- 2 Demonstrate the basic skills required for effective study and learning.
- 3 Review one's own academic progress during the first year of study, supported through individual PDP meetings with a named personal tutor.

Learning Activities

Lectures, Seminars, Tutorials: The module is taught through lectures and seminars, supplemented by a blackboard site and online reading and AV materials. Lecture topics are inter-connected, not stand alone items; for example a lecture may set the broader theoretical context for subsequent lectures. Seminars are used to consolidate students' theoretical understanding and to explore contemporary, illustrative examples. Tutorials are used to support small-group and individual learning needs.

Notes

This module develops a deep understanding of sociological perspectives on identity and representation, and equality and diversity, in contemporary society, whilst exploring the intersections of race, class, gender, sexuality, age, disability and/or social class. Moreover, the module will develop, enhance and practise essential academic study skills, including library search, identifying and analysing relevant sources, referencing, and academic writing. Also integral to the module will be individual PDP meetings with students' personal tutor in order to review students' transition into HE and academic progress during their first year of study.
