Module Overview
Additional Information	The European Union is a unique polity, the like of which has never been seen before or since its creation. Through the transfer of powers from the national governments of Member States to the institutions of the Union, a 'new legal order of international law' was created which established the principle of EU law primacy over national legislation in areas of EU competence (e.g. agriculture and fisheries, internal market, customs union, environment, transport, competition rules, etc.). In other words, Member States have accepted to come under the legal jurisdiction of the EU, its institutions and legislation in areas of transferred competence. With the UK being a Member State of the Union since 1973, the evolution of the EU legal order is highly relevant and pertinent to our understanding of UK/EU relation and its consequences on the British legal system. "European [Union] law is an integral part of the law of England and Wales. It can be relied on by, and enforced against, private individuals, small and large businesses, and governments and other public bodies. European law goes hand in hand with English and Welsh law in many different situations, such as employment rules, commercial activity, consumer rights, and protection of the environment. It has influenced the way in which law has developed and been applied within the United Kingdom, and has the ability to override aspects of national law." The Law Society As it emerges that close to 10% of British legislation comes from Brussels and that the number of EU-inspired domestic laws is ever growing, UK solicitors and barristers increasingly find themselves having to advise their clients on EU law related matters. It is therefore important for students who wish to qualify and later practice to become better acquainted with the significance and application of EU law, and its influence and impact vis-à-vis domestic legislation. Finally, this module is also an opportunity for students to widen their awareness of European affairs, and further develop their initial perception of governance, democratic and citizenship issues at both domestic and European levels.
